- What Public Libraries will lose without Net Neutrality

New York Public Library's CEO and president Anthony Marx and associate director of information policy Greg Cram discuss the issue, explaining exactly which library resources an open internet protects, who would be hurt the most by net neutrality's rollback, and why handing the internet to ISPs could threaten the basic foundation of American democracy.

The rollback of net neutrality opens the possibility for ISPs to start to play with how we pay for the internet, but because [it hasn't] been rolled back yet, we don't have evidence that they will in fact do those things. It's a little speculative at this point. I think everyone is speculating a little bit in this. But the indications we got from the ISPs are that there will be paid prioritization and for us, there are specific things that would likely end up in the slow lane.

- Scientific Search Engines are getting more Powerful

Today, even though we can't access Scholar directly from the Google-prime page, it has become the internet's default scientific search engine—even more than once-monopolistic Web of Science, the National Institutes of Health's PubMed, and Scopus, owned by the giant scientific publisher Elsevier. But most science is still paywalled. More than three quarters of published journal articles—114 million on the World Wide Web alone, by one (lowball) estimate—are only available if you are affiliated with an institution that can afford pricey subscriptions or you can swing $40-per-article fees. In the last several years, though, scientists have made strides to loosen the grip of giant science publishers. They skip over the lengthy peer review process mediated by the big journals. Review comes after. The paywall isn't crumbling, but it might be eroding. The open science movement, with its free distribution of articles before their official publication, is a big reason.

- Ten Reasons Libraries are still better than the Internet

"Thanks to the internet, we no longer need libraries or librarians." You most likely hear some variation on that theme pretty regularly.

Sixteen years ago, American Libraries published Mark Y. Herring's essay "Ten Reasons why the internet is no substitute for a Library" (April 2001). Technology has improved exponentially since then—social media didn't even exist yet. But even the smartest phone's intelligence is limited by paywalls, Twitter trolls, fake news, and other hazards of online life. Here are 10 reasons why libraries are still better than the internet.

1. Libraries are safer spaces.
2. Libraries respect history.
3. Librarians digitize influential primary sources.
4. Librarians are leaders in increasing online access to scholarly information.
5. Librarians are publishers.
6. Libraries host makerspaces.
7. Librarians can help you sort the real news from the fake.
8. Librarians guide you to exactly what you need.
9. Librarians do not track your reading or search history to sell you things.
10. Librarians do not censor.

Libraries continue to provide benefits that are both tangible—such as community spaces and human interaction—and harder to quantify—access, privacy, intellectual freedom. The internet is an indispensable and irreplaceable tool for modern living. But it is not a library and will not replace the work of librarians.
